FUND COMMENTARY

Equity market performance over the month of July was mainly driven by a further decline in the rate of US inflation, resilient economic growth and by specific company results. Despite the disappointingly slow recovery of the Chinese economy and their growing risk of deflation, the US macro-economic backdrop in particular has been more favourable to equity markets.

Just over half of the S&P 500 constituents have already reported. Whilst investor expectations have been relatively muted, both overall revenue and earnings growth remain in positive territory. Revenue has moderately outperformed expectations, whilst 80% of companies have delivered better than expected earnings results.

Share price reactions to company results thus far have been quite volatile. In many of the cases where prices had appreciated leading up to the results, there have been negative reactions if a positive earnings surprise and rise in outlook was not delivered. This has been most notable in health care, where challenges around support staff have not been totally resolved yet. Against this, the resilient US economy has brought into focus how some industries have been overly cautious and are now starting to catch up with reality. For example, the US digital advertising industry has been in an earnings ‘recession’ since the end of last year, but is now starting to grow from a low base.

We have in July been more active than usual. With the exceptionally strong performance of the luxury industry since the Pandemic, we have realised some of our profits in this sector. The exceptionally strong performance of our technology-related stocks on the Artificial Intelligence developments has resulted in strong valuation multiple expansion. We have also realised some of our profits in this context. The volatility in health care stocks offered us an opportunity to reallocate weightings within the sector.

The best contributors to performance over the month have been Alphabet, Adobe and Zoetis. The largest detractors were Edwards Lifesciences, Stryker and Estée Lauder.

Opinions expressed represent the view of SFIM at the time of preparation. They are subject to change and should not be interpreted as investment advice.
